

ON FAVOR TARIFF
FOR TUNGSTEN

Mining Association Plans to Protest Against Federal Tax On Metals.

Denver, Colo., Aug. 2.—Cooperation with other metal mining associations for the west, discussion of plans for urging tariff protection of the tungsten industry and proposed changes in federal mining laws were among the questions to be considered at the second annual convention of the Colorado Metal Mining association, which met here today.

May Unite in Protest.

Mining men expressed the opinion that an effort probably will be made to unite the tungsten and copper industry throughout the west in a movement to protest to congress against the imposition of a federal tax upon copper, lead and zinc.

Representing the sentiment favoring tariff protection of the tungsten industry, delegates asserted that the market in this country is likely to suffer a slump with the restoration of peace in Europe. Some declared that foreign tungsten ores being shipped into this country in large quantities, which, they said, would affect the price here and curtail the production in western states, which exceeded $5,000,000 for the year ending June 30 last.

he laid his hand on her arm. "Child," he said, softly, "why were you unwilling to do as I asked? Surely," with a smile that made Agnes writhe inwardly, "you are not afraid to come over into my office—are you?"

"Of course, I am not!" she declared, angrily. "I have told you, Mr. Bainbridge, that I am ready to take your dictation."

Picking up her notebook and pencil,

As she crossed the big outer office with him, she was uncomfortably conscious that Annie Rooney's eyes were upon her and that Joe, meeting her, winked at her slyly. What an exhibition she had made of herself!

She did not look up as Bainbridge motioned her to a chair, and, seating herself, began to dictate rapidly.

She needed all her skill to keep up with his swift flowing utterances. Indeed, several times, she was obliged to ask him to repeat the last few words of a sentence. She stifled the uneasy suspicion that he was trying to confuse her.

"I will go in at once and type these at my machine," she said, "and send them back to you."

As she passed him, the odor of spring flowers assailed her nostrils, and she glanced at his deck. There in a tumbler was the bouquet she has seen him bring into the office this morning. He saw her look at it, and spoke in a matter of fact tone.

"Presles and daffodils make a pretty combination in yellow, don't they?" he observed, stooping to smell the blossoms. "I always like to have them near me at this time of year. They smell so springlike."

Then he seated himself again without further remark, and Agnes went on her way.

It was borne in on her on her way home that afternoon that she had been a bit too rapid in jumping to unwarranted conclusions.

She repeated that she was merely a worker in a large organisation and regarded as a cog in a wheel and a very small cog at that.

The more she thought over the day's incidents the more she was confirmed in her previous estimate of her own foolishness.

After all, then, she told herself, he is a beast; the flowers for which he
